UP health officials in a fix as vaccine kills four kids

Devinder Grewal | Gurgaon

In sad coincidence, the day a 10-year-old girl in Amritsar was declared healthy after she was vaccinated against polio, four children in Uttar Pradesh died after getting vaccinated against other diseases. The government has been hard-pressed to avoid any conclusions against polio vaccination after the death of the 10-year-old girl in Amritsar.

Tribals hit

Ishfaq-ul-Hassan | Srinagar

CRPF companies on the outskirts of the valley begun training the tribals for their security services.

Karat wanted to teach PM lesson

From p1

Karat had urged the centre to take a strong lead on the three-cornered dispute with the Centre and Pakistan concerning the liberation of Kashmir. If Karat had his way, he added, the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections. But even if the centre did not do so, Karat said, the centre should have secured the support of regional parties in the state to form an anti-militancy corridor. He also accused the centre of giving the wrong signals by looking the other way as the Pakistan army continued its shelling along the Line of Control. He said that the centre should have declared the Kashmir issue as a national disaster and had started the negotiations before the elections.